After registration, the user needs to log in.

There is a menu with links on the home page.

Below are then 3 highlighted (latest) posts.

Below the latest posts is a list of all blog posts, with pagination done where 3 posts are displayed on each page. Logged-in posts have an additional edit button.

In the sidebar there is a search form in which by typing characters, posts are filtered by name, sort of options by date to display the latest or oldest posts first, and links to categories. All three functionalities were done via ajax (I pagination).

Below are also the 3 most recent posts.

Clicking on a post takes you to a page to view it:

ADMIN

Logging in to the blog as an administrator opens the admin panel. At the very top there is a logout button, a link to return to the blog and in the right corner by clicking on the user account you enter the administrator view.

Clicking on the posts goes to the table with the posts that belong to it.

Clicking on the comments goes to the table with the comments that belong to it.

The dashboard first contains blocks with statistics of the entire blog: the total number of posts, comments, registered users, as well as the number of users who deactivated the account.

Below is a table with key user activities (Log file).

Records are kept when a new user has registered, when he has logged in, logged out, created a post, deleted a post, edited a post, added a comment, etc.

Pagination and filtering by date were performed.

To the right of the admin panel is a menu with links.

In the Posts link, clicking on "All" displays a table with all the posts on the blog

The view button takes the admin to the blog itself and displays that post.

The edit button takes you to the edit post form, and the Delete button deletes the post.

Clicking on the posts goes to the table with the posts that belong to it.

Same as clicking on comments

Clicking on the following link in the (Comments) menu also contains a table with all the comments. The view button is used to go to the blog post, where the administrator can directly add or delete a comment.

Also delete in the table is used to delete comments.

The menu also contains links for the Navigation menu, and social networks, where there are also tables to display, as well as adding new links or changing them.
